The air-cooled heat exchanger architecture described in this study is a fundamentally new approach that simultaneously eliminates all three of the drawbacks of conventional air-cooled heat exchanger technology.

A Fundamentally New Approach to Air-cooled Heat Exchangers

The center of an air cooled heat exchanger is the bundle. This pressure vessel consists of three main sections; headers, finned tubes and supporting structure. The inlet and outlet headers serve as a transition between the customer's manifolds and finned tubes, distributing the process fluid evenly within the pressure vessel.
